

In the Library of Lost Objects By Noel Duffy He co edited (with Theo Dorgan) Watching the River Flow: A Century in Irish Poetry (Poetry Ireland 1999) and was the winner of the START Chapbook Prize in 2003 for his collection The Silence After. In the Library of Lost objectshq His debut collection In the Library of Lost Objects was published by Ward Wood London in 2011 and was shortlisted for the 2012 Strong Award for Best First Collection by an Irish Author. Kindle In the Library of Lost objectshq furniture His searching for the essential in things is nicely captured in the 'Horologist's Dream of Silence' a dream of: 'a watch stripped of all embellishments / and the vanities of his craft. Book In the Library of Lost objects shot ' But the real strength of the poetry lies in the resourcefulness of Duffy's language so that the number Pi is seen: 'Receding into / the animal dark / that prowls at the edge / of the square / of white parchment: In the Library of Lost Objects booking His second collection On Light Carbon followed in October 2013 with his third collection Summer Rain appearing in August 2016. In the Library of Lost Objects book Street Light Amber a narrative sequence of love poems was published in spring 2020 again with Ward Wood. Book In the Library of Lost objectshq Noel was awarded the Patrick Katherine Kavanagh Fellowship in Poetry 2018: In the Library of Lost Objects booking Shortlisted for the 2012 Strong Award for Best First Collection by an Irish Poet. In the Library of Lost Objects nonfiction text In the Library of Lost Objects This is a stimulating collection: In the Library of Lost Objects nonfiction reading Noel Duffy's background and interest in all things scientific compels us to look again at objects we thought familiar: a wasp; a fossil; an apple: In the Library of Lost objectscript tutorial ' Like a nineteenth century cabinet of curiosities this is a collection to be returned to with wonder: In the Library of Lost objectshq Poetry Fiction Nonfiction Particularly loved the poem about a stone[1]

Noel Duffy was born in Dublin. Poetry Fiction Nonfiction

